SUGGESTED ANSWER

I was desperately focusing my attention trying to understand, though, to discern, but whenever I managed to choose two syllables, the third would fall upon them and demolish the poor sense that I had presumed with good will. I was listening and straining my entire lucidity, my entire will, only to convince myself that it wasn't possible. It was, of course, hot, it was boiling hot, but still, it was impossible that the speech, the brains of these people should melt like lava, that sentences should get disarticulated, that their thoughts should spread out and hang loose. It was not possible that I no longer had anyone to whom to shout a warning which, just a moment ago, I couldn't believe that I had to give. A happy madness orchestrated the unleashed shouts of the passers-by, who hurried from one side to the other, pointing out disasters to one another, in between fits of laughter, with outstretched arms, and always searching for yet another show, one even more unwitnessed and more complete.
