SUGGESTED ANSWER

We cannot/can't know how the history of the century/age would have changed if Enver Pasha had ordered his tired/weary and demoralized army to take the road through the passes towards/to Trabizond, and had been, at least for a moment, within the range/in the line of Misak Torlakian's weapon/gun. Probably, however, / but perhaps Enver Pasha, the petty/small commander who dreamed of being Napoleon or Frederic the Great, but who, after the defeat at Şarikamis where, of the almost/nearly one hundred thousand soldiers of his army, more than four-fifths had been, like those/the army of his royal idol, destroyed by typhus and cold, more than/over a century ago, was no longer so haughty and reckless. So, he had decided to give up the sea route, went down/descended through Sivas in central Anatolia, and kept to the cobbled roads, more uncomfortable for the bedraggled/enraptured army and his high-heeled boots, downright feminine, but surrounded by flat plateaus, therefore safer. Once he returned to the capital, embarrassed by his own weakness and, like the other members of the alliance, extremely revengeful, his first order was to complete the action of disarming and sending the soldiers of Armenian origin to work on concentration camps.
